Introduction

On March 2, 1853 Congress, passed the Organic Act, establishing the Territory of Washington. This vast new territory included all of the land west of the Rocky Mountains, north of the Columbia River, and south of the British possessions. President Millard Fillmore named Isaac I. Stevens the first governor of the territory.

The Organic Act dictated the kind of government Washington Territory would have. Republican in form, it was to have an executive branch, a judicial branch and a legislative branch. The legislative branch consisted of two houses, a legislative assembly with eighteen members and a legislative council of nine members. The legislature could pass general and local laws, but all of its laws were subject to the approval of the U. S. Congress.

The Organic Act required that at their first assembly, the members of the legislative council (equivalent to the senate) divide themselves into three classes. The seats of the members of the first class would be open for re-election after the first year, those of the second class would be vacant after the second year, and those of the third class would be vacated at the expiration of the third year, so that one-third of the council seats would be chosen each year. The Act stated that the legislative assembly, or house of representatives, would initially consist of eighteen members, elected for one-year terms. The number could be increased in proportion to the population as long as the total membership of the council and the assembly combined did not exceed thirty.

The Organic Act provided that prior to the first election of the territorial legislature, a census would be ordered by the governor so that representation in the legislature could be properly apportioned. The task of taking the census was assigned to U. S. Marshal J. Patton Anderson, who preceded Stevens and the other new territorial officials to Washington Territory. The results of the census showed that there were 3,965 citizens in the territory (excluding Indians), of whom 1,682 were qualified to vote.

With the results of Marshal Anderson's census, Governor Stevens apportioned the territory and on November 28, 1853, issued a proclamation calling for the election of a legislature and other territorial officials. The election took place on January 30, 1854. The Legislature assembled in Olympia on February 27, 1854, for its first meeting, which took place in a plain, two-story wooden building fronting the bay in Olympia. The first floor was occupied by the Parker, Coulter & Co. general store. The legislative chambers were on the second floor, which could only be reached by an outside wooden stairway.

The average age of the members was only twenty-eight years. They included ten farmers, seven lawyers, four mechanics, two merchants, two lumbermen, one civil engineer, and one surveyor. The members of the first legislative council were George N. McConaha representing King and Pierce Counties, Daniel Bradford of Clarke County, W. H. Tappan from Lewis County, Seth Catlin from Monticello, Henry Miles from Lewis County, D. R. Bigelow and B. F. Yantis representing Thurston County, Lafayette Balch of Steilacoom, and William P. Sayward. Elwood Evans served as chief clerk.

The members of the first legislative assembly were Francis Chenoweth, Benjamin F. Kendall, Arthur A. Denney, Calvin H. Hale, David Shelton, Ira Ward, L. D. Durgin, Samuel D. Howe, J. A. Bolon, John D. Biles, Henry R. Crosby, A. Lee Lewis, L. F. Thompson, Henry C. Mosely, John M. Chapman, Daniel F. Brownfield, H. D. Huntington, John R. Jackson, and Henry Feister (who died of apoplexy the day after his swearing-in).

Governor Stevens delivered his first address to the legislature on February 28. He asked the members of the legislature to lay the foundations of a body of law which would help ensure a prosperous future for the territory. Stevens stressed the need for roads and schools, and he advised memorializing Congress for help in establishing treaties with the Indians so that the land could be opened for white settlement.

Nearly all of Stevens' suggestions were acted upon by the legislature. To draft a code of laws, the legislature appointed a commission consisting of Chief Justice Edward Lander, Justice Victor Monroe, and former Oregon Justice William Strong. The commission closely followed the code of New York, with additions and changes derived from the codes of Indiana and Ohio, the states from which two of the commissioners had come.

The Organic Act provided that the first session of the legislature should not last longer than one hundred days. At the end of sixty-four days the first legislature had completed its work and its members were ready to return home. In this short time they had formulated and adopted a civil code, a criminal code, a probate law, a general election law, and nearly all other legislation necessary for the conduct of government. They also created eight new counties: Cowlitz, Wahkiakum, Clallam, Skamania, Whatcom, Sawamish, Chehalis, and Walla Walla. Several acts to locate roads in western Washington were also passed.

Some important memorials were also passed at this session, asking Congress for new ports of entry, a marine hospital, lighthouses, and recognition of the land ownership rights of George Bush, the first black to settle in the territory.

The first session of the legislature was considered a success, although two important measures, women's suffrage and prohibition, failed to pass. The members made their way home by canoe and horseback, generally feeling that the job of establishing a government for the territory was well begun.

The second session of the legislature convened on December 4, 1854, and remained in session until February 1, 1855. During this session, the legislature passed a militia law, amended the road, school and fence laws and changed the time of the general election from June to July. The territorial penitentiary was voted to Clarke County, the capitol to Olympia, and the university to Seattle with a branch campus at Boisfort in Lewis County. An act prohibiting the sale and manufacture of "ardent spirits" was also passed but failed when presented to the people for approval.

The third session of the legislature met during the winter of 1855-56, in the midst of the Indian War. This legislature was preoccupied with the conduct of the war, and, to a lesser degree, with changes in the practices of the courts mandated by Congress. The members spent a great deal of time debating Governor Stevens' wartime declaration of martial law in Pierce County and compared their views on how to prosecute the war. One view was in support of General Wool, who simply closed eastern Washington to white settlers, thereby eliminating the friction between whites and Indians. The other view was represented by Governor Stevens and his Washington Territorial Volunteers, who saw defeating the Indians and forcing them onto reservations as the way to end the hostilities. In the end, two political parties came into being: the Stevens Party and the Anti-Stevens Party.

Both parties had successes. The Anti-Stevens Party managed to win a vote of censure of Stevens' martial law actions, but the next year Stevens proved his popularity by winning the office of delegate to Congress. General Wool was recalled by the Army, but his policy of closing eastern Washington was retained.

Washington remained a territory for thirty-six years. During that time the population grew from the initial 4,000 citizens to about 250,000. Cities took the place of frontier settlements, and the "Wild West" became civilized. The Territorial Legislature kept pace with the changes, amending old laws and passing new ones to meet the needs of the growing population and changing circumstances.

In total, the Territorial Legislature created twenty-six new counties and reapportioned the territory twelve times. In 1866 the sessions of the legislature were changed from annual to biennial, and in 1879 membership in the Legislative Council was raised to twelve members, while the number in the Legislative Assembly was raised to twenty-four.

By the early 1870's it was widely held that Washington was ready to become a state. The population level was sufficient and the legislature had created the necessary legal infrastructure. Numerous memorials were sent to Congress requesting admission to the Union, but these were repeatedly denied because of party politics in Washington, D.C.

Most of the early legislators were men who were not very familiar with legal forms or parliamentary methods. They were plain and practical men, who had a certain vision of what they wanted Washington to be and they relentlessly worked toward that goal. Their work compares favorably with that of other states with more polished politicians. There were never any charges that they were improperly motivated. No member was ever charged with corruption, and the effectiveness of lobbyists was minimal. To be sure, frivolous laws were passed, including the concept of "legislative divorce" which was later condemned, but when Washington became a state, the laws of the territory were considered to be so valuable that they were adopted in their entirety and formed the basis for the laws of Washington State.

Although many of the territorial laws have been superseded by newer state laws, some still remain on the books. These relics from the days of Washington Territory were so well drafted that they still reflect the values of the citizens of Washington.

Scope and Content

This index lists all of the laws, memorials and resolutions passed by the Washington Territorial Legislature and held by the Washington State Archives in their original handwritten form. They cover the time period 1854 to 1887.

Each of these documents was considered by both houses of the legislature and is signed by both the speaker of the House of Representatives (sometimes referred to as the Legislative Assembly) and the president of the Legislative Council. They show the progress of Washington from a land of small frontier communities to a territory boasting a population of over 250,000 people.

In the earlier sessions, one can see the basic legal foundations being laid, alongside some rather quaint laws such as the 1855 "Act to Prevent Studhorses, Jackasses and Ridgelings from running at Large" (apparently mares could roam freely, however).

By the 1880's, the emphasis was on refining the language of some of the earlier measures, and it is evident that efforts were being made to regulate commerce and to meet the needs of the new cities.

Throughout the period, "local laws" were passed, giving permission for ferries to be established, incorporating companies, and generally giving the backing of the legislature to local development efforts. As a whole, the laws, memorials and resolutions of Washington Territory reflect the needs and concerns of the people and trace the growth and development of the territory as it progressed from a virtual wilderness to concern over urban sprawl.

Notes on the Arrangement

The laws of Washington Territory were not originally numbered or otherwise organized, so they have been arranged here in the same way as they were later arranged for publication. Each measure has been assigned a two-part control number, consisting of the year of the session during which it was passed and its page number in the published law books. This makes it possible for the researcher to find both the original laws and the printed versions easily.

During processing the documents were flattened and put into acid-free folders and archival document cases in control number order. The data was entered into a computer system and printed out numerically by control number and alphabetically by subject.

The guide consists of four parts. The first is an inventory of the laws arranged by control number, showing the official title of the measure and the number of the box in which it may be found. This is followed by an index arranged by subject.

Part three is a list of the memorials and resolutions, followed by part four, an index to the memorials and resolutions.

Definitions

Laws of Washington Territory: Bills could be introduced in either the House of Representatives or the Legislative Council. To become law, a bill had to be passed by both bodies and signed by the Speaker of the House and the president of the Council. The governor was not required to sign. Any law passed by the legislature could be voided by Congress.

Memorials: Statements of fact addressed to Congress by the legislature, accompanied by a resolution or a petition for action.

Resolutions: Formal expressions of the opinion or will of the legislature, sometimes, but not always, addressed to Congress.
